

THE 1-PAGE MARKETING PLAN

Get New Customers, Make More Money, and Stand out From The Crowd

ALLAN DIB

The Big “So What”

This book provides a step-by-step guide for developing your marketing strategy and plan in 3 phases. Dib explains the marketing process in layman's terms, with practical insights that any small or medium-sized business can use to position the company, attract customers and create marketing systems for sustainable growth.

Introduction

For any business, money is like oxygen. A business that doesn't make money can't survive, much less create value or a positive impact.

- Technical skills alone aren't enough for business success, e.g. being a good designer doesn't mean you can run a good design firm. Likewise, a good product may help you to retain customers, but you need successful marketing to acquire the customers in the first place.
- You can always get more money, but never more time. That's why the most successful business owners invest money to save time (not vice versa), and focus on activities with the greatest leverage.

The 1-Page Marketing Plan is a powerful tool to help you crystallize and implement the high-impact elements of your marketing strategy.

- Most people confuse marketing tactics (e.g. SEO, podcasting) with strategy. To build a house, you must have a blueprint before you decide on the building techniques and materials. A marketing strategy is your

KEY QUOTES

"This book is about growing your business fast and reaping the rewards."

*"Money isn't everything...but it ranks right up there with oxygen."
—Zig Ziglar*

"The most successful entrepreneurs always start with marketing."

"You want to get really good at marketing because that's where the money is."

blueprint for getting your ideal target market to know, like, and trust you enough to buy from you. You need both strategy and tactics to succeed, but strategy must always drive tactics.

- The 80/20 Pareto Principle predicts that the majority of your results will come from a minority of your actions. In any business, marketing provides the biggest leverage: a 10% improvement in marketing skills can lead to an exponential improvement in your bottom line. In addition, the 1-Page Marketing Plan captures the most critical aspects of the marketing planning process, to help you focus on the 20% of actions that will deliver 80% of your results.
- Small/medium businesses can't afford the expensive branding campaigns used by large companies like Coke or Apple. They must rely on direct response marketing which can deliver high returns even on small budgets. Direct response ads are trackable and measurable; they target a specific niche with compelling headlines and sales copy, a highly-targeted offer, a clear call-to-action, short-term and long-term follow-up.
- The 1-Page Marketing Plan breaks down the marketing process into 9 sets of activities over 3 phases of marketing:
  - Before*: when you help cold prospects to know you and indicate interest in your offering.
  - During*: when you get interested leads to like you enough to buy for the first time.
  - After*: when you get customers to trust you, buy regularly and refer others as raving fans.

We'll now zoom in on each of these 3 phases in detail.

KEY QUOTES

"If you want more success you need to start paying attention to and expand the things that give you the most leverage."

"Marketing is the strategy you use for getting your ideal target market to know you, like and trust you enough to become a customer."

The “Before” Phase (Prospects → Leads)

In this phase, your goal is to attract cold prospects, get them to know you and indicate their interest. To do so, you must (i) identify a specific target market, (ii) craft a compelling message and (iii) deliver your message via the right advertising media.

Select Your Target Market

Select a specific target market, so you can (i) focus your limited resources, and (ii) tailor a targeted message that's directly relevant to your audience. The more limited your resources, the more laser-focused you must be. When you try to target “everyone”, it's like shooting arrows blindly in the dark hoping to hit something.

- A niche is a tightly-defined section of a sub-category. For example, within the broad category of “health and beauty”, a specific niche could be “cellulite treatment for women who've just had a baby”. A good niche is one that's “an inch wide and a mile deep”—it's extremely targeted, yet there're many people looking to solve the same problem. This allows you to be focused without limiting your business potential.
- Once you become a specialist at solving a problem that your target market badly wants to solve, price will no longer be an issue. That's why people pay so much more to a top brain/heart surgeon than a general practitioner.
- After you've dominated a niche, you can continue to expand 1 niche at a time. However, if you target too many groups at the same time, you'll dilute your message and resources.

Use the PVP index to identify your ideal customer segment. For example, photography can be further segmented into niches including: weddings, corporate, family portraits, and journalism. You can then rate each of these segments (on a scale of 1-10) against 3 factors:

KEY QUOTES

“By focusing on the right target market for your business, you'll be able to get a better return on the time, money and energy you invest.”

“Trying to target everyone in reality means you're targeting no one.”

“A specialist is paid handsomely to solve a specific problem for their target market.”

- Personal fulfillment: how much you'd enjoy serving the segment;
- Value to the marketplace: how much the customers will pay for your work/solutions; and
- Profitability: How much profits you can make from serving the segment.

One of the best ways to truly understand your prospect is to create an avatar, or a detailed description of your prospect and his/her life. Consider the gender, age and location of someone in your target segment. Put yourself in their shoes: What are their biggest fears, desires, hopes, and frustrations? What are their decision-making biases? What media and websites do they use? What language/jargon do they use? What's the key emotion that drives them? What's the 1 thing they desire above all else?

Craft Your Message

To stand out, capture people's attention and motivate action, you need a compelling message that resonates with your audience.

- When you're crafting an ad, always consider 2 things: What's the purpose and focus of the ad?
- Each ad should only have 1 objective. Make it clear what they should do next and what they'll get in return, e.g. visit your store for a free sample, or leave an email for a free report.

Convey your unique selling proposition (USP), or the reasons to buy from you instead of your competitor.

- Don't compete on the lowest price—a rival can always offer a lower price and you'll end up attracting low-quality clients. Instead, differentiate yourself so you can sell at a premium price.
- An USP has 2 components: (i) why they should buy, and (ii) why buy from you? The ultimate test is this: if you remove the name and logo from the ad/website, can it be differentiated from your competitors'?

KEY QUOTES

"To stand out from the crowd you need to craft a compelling message that grabs the attention of your target market. Once you have their attention, the goal of your message is to compel them to respond."

"Marketing is an uphill battle if you haven't clearly clarified first in your mind why your business exists and why people should buy from you rather than your nearest competitor."

KEY QUOTES

"People buy with emotions first and then justify with logic afterwards."

"Develop your USP, deliver on it and make those you deal with play your game, on your terms."

- Start by asking yourself: Of all your products and services, (i) which one will most certainly solve your target customer's problem, and (ii) which one do you enjoy delivering the most? Then, take the time to figure out what your target market really wants. Remember: people may not know what they want until they see it, and purchases are often made emotionally (then justified later with logical reasons). Consider the questions below, or use surveys and observations to gain deeper insights:
  - (i) What's the biggest benefit from your solution? What are your customers really buying? E.g. when people buy insurance, they're actually buying a peace of mind.
  - (ii) What emotionally-charged words/phrases can grab their attention, or what intriguing story can you tell?
  - (iii) What guarantees or outrageous offers can you make to address their objections?
  - (iv) What can you learn from others who've succeeded (or failed) to sell something similar?
- You can distill your USP by crafting an elevator pitch (a 30-90 seconds summary) of your value proposition. Try this formula: "You know [the problem]? Well, what we do is [the solution]. In fact [the proof]." Focus on the customer and their problem (or solution); don't focus on your company/product.

Once you know what they want, you can craft an irresistible offer.

- You can make your product more remarkable (to justify a higher price) without much higher costs. For example, you can deliver your coffee with beautiful coffee art (which costs almost nothing). To make your offer more irresistible:
  - (i) Consider what's the biggest value or result you can deliver to your customer while still making a profit.
  - (ii) Use their language or jargon, e.g. golfers may use words like "hooks," "slices", or "handicaps".
  - (iii) Give a reason for an unbelievable offer (e.g. clearing old stocks).

(iv) Use value-stacking to make the purchase a no-brainer. If possible, stack your bonuses such that the combined bonuses are worth more than the main offer.

(v) Upsell a complementary item (e.g. extended warranty)

(vi) Offer a payment plan for high-value items, e.g. an upfront payment of $5,000 sounds more scary than 12 payments of $497, even though the instalments add up to almost $6,000.

- People are always more willing to pay to remove an existing pain than to prevent a future problem. Instead of offering discounts, resolve their pain for a higher price, e.g. offer an all-in-one price for a wall-mounted TV with same-day delivery and installation.

 Use effective copywriting that appeals to people's emotions and compels action.

- Don't be afraid to inject some personality and emotions into your communications, e.g. using a talking-head video to describe your offering, or using social media to engage with prospects and customers. An authentic, personal touch is always more effective than a stiff, "professional" approach.
- Ethically target 5 major emotions behind buying behavior: fear, love, greed, guilt, and pride. Use proven words like: Free, Guaranteed, Proven, You, Save, Results, Money, Health, Love, New, Easy, Safety, and Discovery.
- You can create an immediate connection by (i) using your prospects' language, and (ii) targeting a common enemy (e.g. bad economy, lack of time).
- State who your product isn't for. This filters out unsuitable prospects, and makes you seem more credible to the right ones.
- If possible, choose a name/title that clearly conveys your solution, e.g. a handyman business called "Handyfix" is self-explanatory. Go for clarity over cleverness.

"People are much more willing to pay for a cure than for prevention."

"People buy from people, not from corporations."

"We're all big bags of emotion and our buying decisions are made with emotion and then justified with logic later."

Reach Prospects With Advertising Media

Advertising is a good way to communicate your message to your target market, but it's also the most expensive part of your marketing. To get a good return on investment (ROI), you must choose and manage your channels carefully.

Today, it's possible to track and measure most of your marketing campaigns, to know exactly what works and what doesn't.

- A campaign is successful so long as it's profitable, i.e. your earnings are higher than your costs. Specifically, there are 2 vital numbers you must know and track:
  - (i) Customer Acquisition Cost (CAC). If you spend $1,000 to acquire 40 customers, your CAC is $25. If your average sale is $10, you'd lose $15 for every customer acquired (negative ROI). If your average sale is $60, then you earn $35 per customer acquired (positive ROI).
  - (ii) Customer Lifetime Value (CLV) is the sum of your "front-end" sales (what you make upfront from a campaign) and "backend" sales (what you make from a customer's subsequent purchases). The latter is often much more substantial. So, even if your upfront sale is only $10, you'll still make money if your CLV is $100.

These are only 2 numbers that matter. All other statistics (e.g. response rates, conversion rates) are secondary.

Here are a few examples of advertising media you can consider:

- Social media is basically a digital platform for social gatherings, so it's not a good idea to hard-sell there. Moreover, your social media pages aren't owned by you, so you can be removed anytime. Dib recommends using social media to give a human face to your business (e.g. sharing your opinions, responding to customer queries). However, build your own marketing assets (e.g. blogs, email lists, websites), and use social media to drive traffic to those assets.

KEY QUOTES

"What gets measured, gets managed."

"Rather than 'getting your name out there,' you'll fare much better by concentrating on getting the name of your prospects in here."

- Email marketing. Use a prominent opt-in form on your website to capture your visitors' email addresses, then nurture them over email. Success with this media depends on whether your emails are delivered, opened, and read.
  - (i) Send 3 value-building emails for every sales-offer email.
  - (ii) Use compelling titles to improve email open rates.
  - (iii) Use a personal tone as if you're talking to 1 person, even though you're emailing to many people.
  - (iv) Use a proper email marketing system (e.g. MailChimp, Aweber) designed for mass-emails.
  - (v) Email regularly and automate your process where possible.
- Snail mail is still relevant in a digital age. A virtual bouquet of flowers simply can't create same emotional impact as a physical one.

Each media requires specialized knowledge. Once you've selected your media, hire experts for that specific media. Don't try to do it on your own. If a campaign is losing money, stop and change it.

- During the initial phase, test everything, e.g. your header, offer, and positioning. Set a budget for each test, allow yourself to fail frequently and quickly, and learn what works or doesn't.
- Once you've found a winning formula with positive ROI, you'll practically have an unlimited budget and can control how much you wish to spend on marketing. If demand exceeds supply, you can use the opportunity to increase prices.
- A business with only 1 major client, customer source or advertising media will be highly vulnerable. Dib recommends having ≥5 sources of new leads and customers, of which the bulk are generated from paid media (with positive ROI).

"Email doesn't replace postal mail, it complements it."

The “During” Phase (Leads → Customers)

In this phase, your goal is to nurture leads who’re mildly interested in your offer, until they like/trust you enough to buy from you.

Capture Leads

The goal of direct response marketing is not to make an instant sale. It's to find people who're interested in your solutions, so you can gradually build trust and relationships.

- Don't try to sell outright. As a rule of thumb, only 3% of your target market is ready to make an immediate purchase. Another 7% is open to buying, and 30% is interested (but not right now). Of the remaining 60%, half aren't interested to buy and the rest won't use your solution no matter what.
- Instead of selling directly to the 3%, it's better to capture the leads in a database system, so you can follow up with the other 37% and build your future sales pipeline.

To get their contacts, offer an “ethical bribe” in the form of relevant information for a problem they want to solve. This should be an educational resource that's (i) valuable to your audience and (ii) can establish yourself as a trustworthy expert. For example, a wedding photographer could offer videos on how to choose the best photographer for the wedding day.

Nurture Leads

Nurturing leads is like farming, not hunting. Many salespeople give up after just 1-2 tries. In reality, most prospects must be nurtured over several contacts. The good news is, once you've earned their trust, they'll be ready to buy without any hard-selling on your part. There're 3 steps to being a “marketing farmer”:

KEY QUOTES

“Like a farmer you prepare your prospects to become ready for harvesting.”

KEY QUOTES

"The lead nurturing process ensures that leads are interested, motivated, qualified and predisposed to buying from you before you ever try to sell to them."

- Find people who're interested in your solution. Position yourself as a teacher (not a salesperson) by offering relevant info for a problem they want to solve.
- Add them to your database.
- Continually nurture your leads and provide value so they'll remember you.

 Once you have a database of high-probability prospects, keep offering value until they buy or drop off. To manage this process, you need to build your marketing infrastructure.

- Use a customer relationship management (CRM) system to consolidate all your customer interactions.
- Create automations to sort/filter your database, and manage triggers when certain actions are taken, e.g. when someone clicks on a link or submits a form. Once you've successfully automated a process, you can use it repeatedly.
- Over time, you'll accumulate a range of marketing assets in your infrastructure, e.g. lead capture websites, newsletters, email sequences, videos, podcasts, print ads, free reports, etc.
- The volume of snail mail has dropped drastically, making it easier for you to stand out and make an impression compared to the digital space. There are 2 ways to drastically increase the chance of your mail being opened and having an emotional impact:
  - (i) A postal mail that's unusually thick ("lumpy mail") will catch people's attention. You can use memorable items, e.g. a trash bag with the message "Stop wasting money", or a magnet with the message "Attract more clients."
  - (ii) A "shock and awe package" is a physical box filled with unique assets that highlight the benefits of your solutions, e.g. books or DVDs explaining the problems you can solve for your prospect, client testimonials, product samples, gift cards, or handwritten notes. The pack should (i) provide extraordinary value for your prospect, (ii) position you as a trustworthy expert in your field, and (iii) move the prospect further down the buying cycle.

"Let your competitors do cheap and efficient marketing while yours entertains, delights, inspires and wows. It will put you worlds apart."

- A successful business requires 3 types of people: entrepreneurs (who can identify market opportunities and envision solutions), specialists (who have the technical know-how to implement the vision), and managers (to ensure things stay on-track). It's impossible for 1 person to wear all 3 hats. Moreover, good marketing requires continual testing and refinement of your offers, headlines, etc. So, don't try to do everything yourself. Automate what you can and delegate the rest.

- (i) Know what needs to be done by when. Develop a calendar of daily, weekly, monthly, quarterly, and annual marketing activities, and a list of event-triggers and follow-up actions.
- (ii) Find the right people to handle those activities. So long as the person can do the job 80% as well as you can, it's worth delegating the task. Remember: you can always get more money, but not more time.

Convert Sales

 Never behave like a pesky salesman peddling a mass-commodity. If you do the previous steps properly, and position yourself as a sought-after expert who can improve your prospects' or customers' lives, they'll be asking to buy from you after some time.

 Prospects are quick to judge your company's credibility based on first impressions, so make sure you present your business in a way that evokes trust and confidence:

- Regardless of the size of your business, your website must always look credible. Avoid common mistakes like poor web design, a lack of contact email, phone number, business address, privacy policy or terms of use.
- Never use a generic email address (e.g. gmail or hotmail). Invest in your own company email domain (name@company.com).
- Use a national toll free phone number, a toll free word or "vanity" number to improve your credibility and accessibility.

KEY QUOTES

"Making regular offers will make you a better marketer. Getting good at the science of marketing is the key to rapid business growth."

"Stop selling and start educating, consulting and advising."

"Instead of being a pest, I advocate becoming a welcome guest. Send your high probability prospects a continuous stream of value until they're ready to buy."

KEY QUOTES

- Use a proper CRM system to track and manage your leads.
- Use a ticketing system to manage customer support or inquiries.

 Identify your prospects' fears or perceived risks, then use "outrageous guarantees" to make it risk-free to buy from you. If you're in the pest-control business, you can guarantee that the pests will be removed permanently without toxic chemicals, and the house will be properly cleaned, or they'll get 2x the money back.

 Your pricing strategy is one of the most critical components that affects all parts of your business. Yet, many businesses simply set their price just below the market leader, or do a cost mark-up.

- Less is more. Offer just 2-3 product variations, with a premium version priced at about 50% above the standard variation but offering 200% (or 2x) the value.
- Remove perceived risks by offering an "unlimited" version of your service at a fixed price.
- Add an ultra high-ticket item to target your most affluent customers. As a rule of thumb, 10% of your customers will pay 10x more and 1% of your customers will pay 100x more.
- Avoid discounts. Instead, offer more value by upselling, cross-selling, or bundling related items that your customers will value.

 To increase sales conversion:

- Institutionalize the mindset that everyone is in sales. Every person in your company—be it technical support or customer service—should be trained to (i) detect if a customer is interested to upgrade his service, and to (ii) move him forward in the buying process.
- Offer a free trial. This makes it easy for prospects to say "yes", and they're unlikely to stop the service or return the product so long as it meets their needs.
- Remove hurdles to sales, e.g. make sure you offer customers their preferred payment mode, or provide payment plans to break down high-ticket items into smaller monthly installments.

"When you can name the fears and guarantee against them in your marketing, you give yourself an overwhelming advantage over your competitors."

"Make it known that regardless of what their primary role in the business is, responding to sales opportunities is their job."

The “After” Phase (Customers → Raving Fans)

This phase is about converting your customers into raving fans, increasing their lifetime value and encouraging referrals.

Deliver a World Class Experience

Tribes are groups of people who're connected through an idea or leader. To build a tribe of raving fans, you'll need to (i) deliver a consistently wow experience, (ii) build lasting relationships, and (iii) be fun and easy to deal with.

Your ultimate goal is to help your customers to achieve results. If they fail to use your product in the intended way, they won't see results and will have no reason to stay or return, e.g. if they fail to start the 30-day health program that they purchased. So, it's not enough to sell them what they want; you must also give them what they need to get the desired outcomes.

- Break down the post-purchase process into bite-sized pieces and spoon-feed your customers so they'll take the required action to get the most benefits from their purchase. Help them to overcome potential obstacles.

Find ways to wow them with a superb experience:

- Use innovation and showmanship, i.e. creative ways to price, package, finance, market, deliver or support your product. For example, a restaurant can offer a pick-up and drop-off service to let their customers drink with a peace of mind. Blendtec used a series of videos to show how their blender (a typically “boring” product) can blend anything from golf balls to iPhones.
- Use technology to reduce friction, i.e. make the customer process as fast and seamless as possible. Think of each technology (e.g. website, email management software) as

KEY QUOTES

“Our goal is for our customers to achieve results.”

“Sell them what they want but give them what they need.”

“Buying it is just the first step. Putting it to its intended use is another.”

“Your customers don't just want to be serviced. They want to be entertained. Give them what they want by creating a sense of theatre around your product.”

an employee: what role are they hired to do and what's their key performance indicator (KPI)?

- Become a “voice of value” by sharing insightful content and opinions with your tribe.
- Don't just claim that your product is of the “best quality”. Share exactly how much skill, effort, resources or attention go into delivering your product/service.

 You can make money by selling products/services, but true wealth will come from building a scalable, replicable business system.

- A replicable business must include 4 crucial sub-systems:
  - (i) A marketing system to bring in a consistent flow of leads;
  - (ii) A sales system to nurture and convert leads to customers;
  - (iii) A fulfillment system to deliver what you promised; and
  - (iv) An administration system (e.g. finance, human resource) to support the other business functions.
- These systems will allow you to consistently attract new customers, deliver a world-class experience, manage/reduce your operating costs, and potentially license, franchise or sell the business. If you're the sole business owner, such systems will also ensure that you don't become the bottleneck and have an exit strategy if you wish/need to stop working.
- To build your systems, start by documenting the processes:
  - (i) Define the key roles in your business;
  - (ii) Identify the key tasks performed by each role;
  - (iii) Document how each task is performed (using checklists, video/audio training materials etc.) with clear steps and checklists for completing each task properly. These jointly form your operations manual or business know-how.

KEY QUOTES

“The purpose of any new technology in your business is to eliminate friction. We want the fastest and easiest path to the sale, while increasing customer satisfaction.”

“Products make you money, systems make you a fortune.”

“Systems allow mere mortals to run an extraordinary business.”

“If you are indispensable, you are a bottleneck and the business will only move as fast as you can.”

Increase your Customer Lifetime Value (CLV)

 The real money is made by selling more to past or existing customers. Here are 5 main ways to do so:

- Increase prices. If your prices remain unchanged, you'll eventually earn less due to inflation. Explain the reasons behind the price increase (e.g. increase in quality or labor costs) to make it more palatable.
- Present a more expensive item, then upsell a relatively cheaper add-on, e.g. fries to go with a burger, a shirt/tie to go with a suit. You can use words like: "Most customers who bought A also bought B".
- Upgrade existing customers to a higher-priced tier, e.g. a more luxurious car model or a higher-speed Internet plan. Always include an ultra high ticket item in your product mix to (i) cater to your most affluent customers, and (ii) make the other items look comparatively cheaper.
- Increase the frequency of your customers' purchases through (i) reminders (e.g. post-cards, newsletters), (ii) reasons to return (e.g. cash voucher for next purchase), or (iii) recurring subscriptions.
- Reactivate customers who have stopped buying from you:
  - (i) Identify customers who haven't made a purchase in a while;
  - (ii) Create a strong offering to bring them back (e.g. coupon, free offer); and
  - (iii) Contact them to find out why they didn't return (e.g. emails titled "We Miss You" or "Did we do something wrong?")

 Track your key marketing metrics (on a monthly, if not weekly/daily basis) to know exactly how you're doing. These include: the number of new leads, conversion rate (of leads to customers), average transaction value, break-even point, CAC, CLV, recurring revenue and churn rate (% recurring customers who stop buying). Show these numbers on a dashboard so you can see the real-time performance of your business and be notified early if something is wrong.

KEY QUOTES

"Small hinges swing big doors."

"Filling the bucket is great but not if it's leaking at a rapid rate."

Retain good customers and remove bad ones.

- Generally, there are 4 types of customers:
  - (i) Tribe members are the raving fans and promoters of your business. They're crucial for your long-term growth/success.
  - (ii) Churners can't really afford your services. They may buy during a sale, then leave and spread bad reviews about you.
  - (iii) Vampires can afford your services but are more trouble than they're worth, e.g. those who make endless demands/complaints.
  - (iv) Snow Leopards are high-value customers who contribute disproportionately to your revenue. However, they're extremely rare and can't be replicated.
- The Net Promoter Score (NPS) helps to classify customers into Promoters, Detractors or Passives based on their response to this question: "How likely is it that you would recommend our company/product/service to a friend or colleague?"
- Don't be afraid to fire the problematic customers who drain your time, resources and energy (including the detractors, vampires and churners). This frees you up to focus on the high-value tribe members and promoters.

Orchestrate & Stimulate Referrals

Hoping for word-of-mouth is like waiting for a free lunch. You need to proactively generate a steady stream of referrals.

One of the best ways to get referrals is simply to ask for them:

- When you've delivered good results for a customer, ask for referrals by appealing to their ego, offering something valuable they can give to others, and explaining how it'll benefit them too. For example, "Mr. X, we've truly enjoyed

KEY QUOTES

"If you take on toxic customers you'll generate polluted revenue, which makes your businesses sick."

"One of the best strategies for getting what you want in business and indeed in life—just ask."

working with you. If you know anyone who's in a similar situation as yourself, feel free to give them one of these gift cards which will give them $100 off their first consultation with us. Most of our new business comes from referrals from customers like yourself, which allows us to save on advertising and pass the cost-savings back to you."

- Set the expectations early during the customer onboarding process. Let them know that if they get great results from your service, you'd be asking them for referrals (in a way that would also benefit them).

 Partner with complementary products/services who're likely to spend money to acquire the same customers.

- Consider the businesses your customers deal with before they engage your services. For example, if you're a pet food retailer, you can work with a vet to refer your services—offer a finder's fee, or provide gift cards which they can give to their clients.
- Find ways to monetize your customer database with the businesses your clients deal with after yours. For example, you may exchange leads (with permission from your customers), resell the complementary products/services, or become an affiliate referral partner.

 Build your brand or the personality of your business. People can only get to know you after they purchase from you. Build brand equity or goodwill so people will want to continue doing business with you.

Conclusion and Other Details in the Book

This is a compact guidebook packed with useful insights and details to help any small/medium business owner or marketer to attract, nurture, convert and satisfy your customers to earn more money. However, they'll only work if you apply them. With practice, you'll deliver better value, refine your marketing process and see phenomenal results. "Branding is something you do after someone has bought from you, rather than something you do to induce them to buy from you."

"Knowing and not doing is the same as not knowing."
