

THE POWER OF ONE MORE

The Ultimate Guide to Happiness and Success

Ed Mylett

The Big “So What”

Small steps can unlock big breakthroughs. In this book, Ed Mylett shows how doing one more—one more try, one more habit, one more act of courage—can reshape your identity, mindset, and results to create lasting success.

Introduction

Extraordinary success isn't built on massive leaps, but on small, intentional decisions made consistently. Ed Mylett learned this through personal experience, from growing up with an alcoholic father to building a multimillion-dollar business.

- Drawing from his life, coaching work, and insights from peak performers, Mylett presents a simple yet powerful philosophy: the Power of One More. This approach combines mindset shifts, daily habits, leadership principles, and personal strategies to help you progressively level up—personally, professionally, and spiritually.
- In this summary, we'll break down 18 levers of transformation that you can apply to raise your standards, sharpen your focus, and become the person you were meant to be.

KEY QUOTES

“The Power of One More teaches you to combine your gifts with directed, intentional thoughts and focused actions.”

“You were not born to be average or ordinary. You were born to do something great with your life.”

“You may be surprised how one more thought and one more action will change your life forever.”

“One more thing is often all it takes. And frequently, it's only one more step away from where you are now.”

Harness the Power of the “One More” Philosophy

KEY QUOTES

Harness the Power of the One More Philosophy

One More Identity Shift

Your identity is how you see yourself—the collection of your deepest thoughts, beliefs, and expectations. Your identity acts like a thermostat that controls your life conditions, defines your self-worth, and silently controls your results in every area of life.

- For example, you might want $10 million, but if your thermostat says “I’m not worth that much,” you will subconsciously self-sabotage—blowing deals or over-spending until you’re back at a level you believe you deserve.
- Your identity is often formed by childhood and life experiences. In other words, it’s not fixed and can be changed, one action at a time. Every time you keep a promise to yourself—whether it’s waking up early or following through on a task—you build self trust. As your self-image improves, so do your results.

You can’t achieve 100 degrees of fitness, wealth, or love if your identity is stuck at 75 degrees. Raise your internal thermostat and upgrade your identity using 3 levers:

“What we perceive about ourselves is what we believe about ourselves.”

*“They always say time changes things, but you actually have to change them yourself.”
—Andy Warhol*

“Are you willing to sacrifice who you are for who you could be?”

- Faith: Believe that you were created for more, and your life has purpose.
- Intentions: Set empowering statements each day, like “I’m here to serve, grow, and lead.” Or, “I’m healthy, loving, and successful.”
- Associations: Surround yourself with people who uplift you, and challenge you to grow.

One More Mental Filter

Your brain doesn’t show you the world as it is; it shows you what it is trained to notice. The Reticular Activating System (RAS) is the mental filter in your brainstem. It sifts through billions of data points and only lets in what’s important to you.

- What you focus on gets amplified. The RAS doesn’t judge what’s good or bad. It simply amplifies your beliefs and focus.
 - For example, once you decide to buy a white SUV, you suddenly start seeing white SUVs everywhere. The SUVs were always there, but now your RAS tags them as important.
- This explains the confirmation bias and how expectations of both success or failure can be self-fulfilling.
 - Once you install a belief (e.g. “I’m great at solving problems”), your RAS finds evidence to prove it. This creates a self-reinforcing loop: beliefs → attention → actions → results → stronger beliefs.

Your RAS learns what matters to you through the thoughts you repeat, the images you visualize, and the emotions you associate with them. To reprogram the RAS:

- Set a clear goal, e.g. “I want to lose 20 pounds in 6 months.” Focus on what you want (e.g. “I want to be strong and healthy”), not what you don’t want (e.g. “I don’t want to be overweight”).
- Vividly visualize what that looks, sounds, and feels like.
- Repeat daily with conviction and emotion, out loud or in writing.

KEY QUOTES

“Let faith move mountains in all parts of your life.”

“Apply good intentions to all parts of your life, and then watch what happens.”

“When you see a happy or financially successful family, understand that at some point in their history, they weren’t happy or successful. That is, until...The One in that family changed the family tree forever.”

“Put actions to these thoughts. It’s not enough to mentally convince yourself. You can’t wish your way to success.”

“The stronger your beliefs, or the more emotionally charged an issue is to you, the stronger your confirmation bias and selective recall will be.”

“Through repetition, your obsessions eventually become your possessions.”

One More Attempt

Success is a numbers game. When you feel stuck or discouraged, don't give up. Just give it one more try.

- Success doesn't come from giant leaps, but from consistent steps forward. It's like learning to ride a bike—you might wobble and fall at first, but each attempt builds skill and confidence, until it clicks. What once seemed hard now becomes second nature.
- Ed Mylett compares success to hitting a piñata. You might not see results initially from the first few swings. But if you keep swinging, the piñata eventually bursts open and the reward spills out.
- Don't quit just before the breakthrough. In 1998, Mylett nearly quit when only 8 people showed up for his business presentation, but he decided to go all in and give it one more shot. That became the turning point of his career, eventually leading to millions in income and impact.

Small steps compound over time to create massive transformation.

- Persist with focus and intention. Know where you're headed, put in your best effort, and keep adjusting until you reach your goals.
- Believe in your ability to create change. As you push your limits, you learn and expand your capacity. You also develop a quiet confidence that you're going further than most people ever will.
- When you give your all and "empty your tank," you make space for new opportunities, beliefs, and identity.

One More Time Advantage

Time is your most limited resource. Master 5 powerful principle to bend and multiply time, control your schedule, compress work and expand results that matters.

KEY QUOTES

"You stack [wins] on top of each other to produce significant long-term changes in your life."

"Your greatest gains and successes happen when you push yourself to new places and new limits... our new level of capacity becomes your new norm."

"Most people give up. They don't do the work you're willing to do. So, they won't get the results you'll get."

*"Empty your cup, so that it may be filled."
—Bruce Lee*

"When the goal is further away, you jog toward that goal. When it's right in front of you, it's a sprint."

- Most people move slowly when the finish line feels far away. Shrink your finish line to create urgency and turn your long-term goals into short sprints.
- Convert 1 day into 3 mini-days. Split each day into three 6-hour blocks: morning (6am-12pm), afternoon (12pm-6pm), and evening (6pm-12am). Treat each time block as a full day to create urgency and focus, effectively giving you 21 days a week instead of 7.
- Control time rather than let it control you. Take charge of the first 30 minutes of your day to shape the entire trajectory. Avoid phones or external inputs. Use that time to align with your values, review your goals/priorities, and plan your day.
- What gets measured, improves. Measure performance regularly on a weekly, daily, or even hourly basis, so you can do course correction quickly and improve fast.
- You can't move forward if you're stuck in the past. Focus on the future and take action now toward your goals and dreams.

One More Emotional Reset

We all live in an "emotional home", i.e. there's a pattern of dominant emotions we return to each day.

- Such emotional patterns shape our decisions and quality of life. Those who consistently experience love, joy, and peace enjoy better well-being (regardless of wealth or status) compared to those stuck in anger, anxiety, or guilt.
- We unknowingly "hoard" harmful emotions, e.g. if you're used to disappointment, you expect more of it. This leads to emotional clutter that clouds our judgment. We also repress emotions, which resurface in other forms (e.g. stress, illness, self-sabotage).

Emotions are neither good nor bad. They can help us to make sense of what's happening inside/around us. Even fear, guilt, and anxiety can be harnessed for motivation or protection. The goal isn't to avoid negative emotions, but to manage them intentionally so they don't define your life.

KEY QUOTES

"There is a direct correlation between how fast you'll run versus how close you are to the finish line."

"Your relationship to time can profoundly affect how far you go in life."

"Where performance is measured, performance improves."

"Your mind always seeks out what is familiar because there is a level of comfort, even when the familiar works against you."

"Hoarding emotions dulls your ability to distinguish between reality and what you perceive to be reality."

"Too much of any emotion, perceived as either good or bad, doesn't serve you well."

- Be honest about what you're feeling and why, e.g. you might buy flowers to feel love, or chase promotions to feel pride. By naming the emotions driving your actions, you can pursue goals with clarity instead of compulsion.
- Remove emotional clutter to make space for better feelings. Clear out resentment, guilt, or shame so they don't dominate your life.
- Choose your dominant emotions intentionally. Ask yourself: What 5-6 emotions do I want to experience every day? Commit to those emotions (e.g. joy, peace, gratitude), so your brain's RAS can start finding ways to create those feelings.
- Use daily practices to reinforce the desired emotions:
 - (i) Meditate to clear mental clutter and set emotional intent.
 - (ii) Balance work with rest, restoration and self-care.
 - (iii) Identify and manage triggers that spark stress, anger or other destructive emotions.
 - (iv) Consciously shift your focus from unhelpful emotions to supportive ones (e.g. shift from insecurity to gratitude).

One More Positive Connection

The people around you—family, teachers, friends, and colleagues—shape how you think, act, and grow. Some lift you up while others hold you back.

- Think of your relationships like a bullseye with three rings:
 - (i) The outer circle includes strangers or acquaintances.
 - (ii) The middle circles includes casual friends and colleagues.
 - (iii) The inner circle includes the 2-5 people closest to you.
 - (iv) You are the bull's eye. Those closest to you have the greatest impact on your identity, habits, and outcomes—and vice versa.

To raise your standards, you must refine your associations, especially your inner circle.

KEY QUOTES

"People are intentional about their actions, but rarely do we spend enough time thinking about the emotions attached to those actions."

"Once you learn to identify your emotions, they begin to loosen their grip on you."

"Honesty is the springboard from which every emotion emanates. Intentionality is the muscle you need to get you to those honest emotions."

"Like it or not, you are the sum of your relationships, and you are judged for it."

"To succeed in life, your peer group's standards must align with your own."

*"You will never outperform your inner circle."
—John Wooden*

"The people you allow into your inner circle are among the most important choices of your life. Choose wisely."

- Make sure the 2-5 people you spend the most time with have things you want in your life (e.g. health, wealth, peace, or emotional strength).
- Sometimes, you must distance yourself from people who no longer support your growth—even if you love them.
- If you can't fully disconnect from certain people (e.g. family), then raise your standards to influence them positively. Don't let them lower your standards.

One More Dream Ignited

As children, we dream and imagine freely. But as adults, we often stop dreaming—held back by fear, regret, or the weight of past failures.

- When you stop imagining a better future, you stop moving forward. You get stuck in survival mode, constantly worrying about failing, looking foolish, or losing what you already have.

To live your best life, you must dream boldly, think freely, and act intentionally. Stop operating from memory, and start operating from vision and imagination.

- Let go of the past to create space for new possibilities. Imagine emptying your mental glass of old stories and painful scripts, then refilling it with new relationships, adventures, and dreams.
- Give yourself permission to dream. Drop unhelpful mental scripts like "I'm too old" or "It's too late."
- Use your imagination intentionally. Daydream to reconnect with your inner child, visualize your dream life, then take real steps to turn imagination into reality. When you reconnect with your dreams, you change your emotional state to attract people, ideas, and opportunities that match the future you see.

KEY QUOTES

"People ease in and out of our lives all the time. Everything has an expiration date."

"Go confidently in the direction of your dreams. Live the life you imagined."
—Henry David Thoreau

"The happiest people in life operate out of their imaginations and dreams, and not their histories."

"Dreaming is free...[but] a lack of dreaming will cost you everything."

"I use memories, but I will not allow memories to use me."
—Deepak Chopra

One More Good Question

The questions you ask shape your mindset and outcomes. To live fully and grow, ask better, braver, and more empowering questions.

- Stop asking disempowering questions like “What if I fail?” or “Why can't I get this right?”
- Use bold, future-focused, empowering questions to focus your brain on what matters, uncover truths and unlock possibilities. Better questions lead to better answers, better results, and better quality of your life. For example:
 - (i) What's one more thing I can do to support my team or family?
 - (ii) What's one more thing I can let go of that's holding me back?
 - (iii) What's one more way I can bring peace, gratitude, or energy into my day?
- Each question plants a seed in your mind. You won't always have an immediate answer, and this could point to potential areas for growth. Just sit with the questions and let them challenge you, like peeling an onion layer by layer.

One More Goal That Matters

Real goals aren't just tasks or checklists. They energize you and turn inner desires into outward momentum. The right goals activate your brain, shape your focus, direct your actions, and pull in people and opportunities aligned with your vision.

There's no perfect goals system for everybody. Design a simple, flexible system that suits you. Some rules of thumb include:

- Set goals in a peak state—not when you're feeling discouraged or distracted.
- Tie each goal to a compelling reason that truly drives you. Ask yourself: Why does this matter? What's at stake if I don't follow through?

KEY QUOTES

*“The unexamined life isn't worth living.”
—Socrates*

“If you want to change the quality of your thoughts, you need to change the quality of the questions you ask.”

“Better questions lead to better answers. Better answers lead to a better life.”

“In many cases, to grow, the best answers will be the most difficult for you to address.”

“The right way to approach setting your goals is to keep to a simple plan of attack.”

- Link short-term goals to long-term dreams, so you can build momentum with small wins that cumulatively move you toward something bigger and even life-changing. Figure out the required skills/resources, but don't complicate things by splitting them into sub-categories (like finance, health etc.)
- Reinforce your goals daily, using reminders, visual cues, or written reflections to keep them front of mind and emotionally engaging. Create and review goals regularly (e.g. hourly, daily, weekly, monthly, yearly).

One More High Standard

Goals vs standards: Goals are the outcomes that you want, while standards are the behaviors and expectations that you accept. To achieve high goals, you need high standards.

- You may not always hit your goals, but you'll always fall to the lowest standards you tolerate—whether it's your effort, habits, or relationships.
- While you can't always control your outcomes, you can always control your standards. If you want to change your life, first raise your standards.

Here are 9 ways to activate higher standards in your life:

- Know your why: Strong emotional reasons keep you going.
- Break standards into clear, specific steps, e.g. "I'll work out 4x a week and follow a lean meal plan."
- Be realistic: Build from where you are, not where you wish you were.
- Get help where needed, e.g. find mentors or accountability partners to stay on-track.
- Use technology: Record a goals video while you're in a peak state, then revisit it when you need a boost.
- Match your standards to the size of your goals.
- Drop perfectionism: Progress beats perfection every time.

KEY QUOTES

"When you create a single list, the only thing to keep in mind is whether you're creating a momentum-building goal or a stretch, life-altering goal."

"What you think leads to what you need. When you consciously access what you need, your mind sets about the business of making your goals a reality."

"Goals without standards are empty."

"If you want the best possible chance of reaching your goals, you need to adjust your standards, and reaching your goals will become almost automatic."

"If you're willing to tolerate something, that's probably what you're going to get."

"Be selfish when it comes to developing your standards. This is your journey...It's personal."

"Perfection is the lowest standard there is. And realistically, perfection doesn't exist."

- Plan ahead, but don't overthink. Just begin and adjust as you go.
- Focus on your values, not others' expectations.

One More Impossible Thought

To live an extraordinary life, you have to think bigger and act bolder than what feels comfortable or realistic.

- Dare to imagine what others consider "impossible", then act as if these are already within reach. The intensity of your actions must match the size of your goals.
- Align your thoughts, words, and behavior. Close the gap between what you say and what you do. Build belief and conviction in your dream, then take action like it's possible—even if you feel uncertain or afraid.

One More Habit Installed

Habits shape your life far more than motivation. That's because habits are automatic—they run in the background, influencing your behavior without conscious thought.

- Habits follow a predictable loop: Trigger → Action → Prize. To create lasting change, you must rewire this loop:
 - Trigger: Every habit starts with a trigger or a cue (e.g. sitting on the couch after work);
 - Action: The cue triggers a behavior (e.g. grabbing a bag of chips);
 - Prize: The behavior delivers a reward (e.g. dopamine hit from the chips) which reinforces the habit.
- To replace old habits with new ones, you can change any of the 3 elements until it becomes your new default loop.
 - Replace the trigger, e.g. take an evening walk instead of sitting at the couch.

KEY QUOTES

*"Thinking is good.
Overthinking is bad!"*

"Unless you put actions to those thoughts, you're not going anywhere in life."

"You must be willing to dream big, take a chance, set your barriers aside, and do it anyway."

"Alignment occurs when your thoughts manifest themselves in the actions you take."

"Motivation and inspiration come and go. But rituals and habits are constant."

"Getting fired up about living your life well each day is important but nowhere near as important as having good habits."

*"A habit cannot be tossed out the window; it must be coaxed down the stairs a step at a time."
—Mark Twain*

- (ii) Upgrade the action, e.g. replace the chips with herbal tea.
- (iii) Attach a better prize, e.g. watch your favorite show only after you consume tea instead of chips.

It usually takes about 30 days of consistent action to install a new habit, but the effort pays off. Keep building better habits that support your goals and values—whether it's eating clean, sleeping better, nurturing your faith, or spending time with loved ones.

One More Team Multiplier

A multiplier is someone who elevates everyone and everything around them. They don't just deliver results—they inject belief, synergy, and momentum that lift the entire team, making the whole much greater than the sum of its parts.

- Take Tom Brady, for example. When he joined the Tampa Bay Buccaneers in 2020, the team hadn't made the playoffs in over a decade. But within a year, they won the Super Bowl. That was possible because Brady brought more than skill; he also brought urgency, discipline, and belief. He changed how the team trained, communicated, and thought, and he attracted other elite players onto the team.
- It's not just about talent, but having the team chemistry and the right mix of people that bring out the best in one another.

Leaders can help multipliers to thrive by creating the right environment:

- Show the big picture so they can see how their work matters and how they can contribute meaningfully beyond their role.
- Create opportunities for them to lead, share ideas and influence outcomes naturally.
- Give them freedom to execute. If possible, pair them with mentees who can grow alongside them.
- Free them from low-value tasks so they can focus on what they do best. Challenge them with ambitious goals and meaningful work.

KEY QUOTES

"When you look for One More opportunities to create new habits, you'll find a clear path to a more blissful life."

"Don't fear change. When you accept your new reality, the most amazing things can happen."

"Great team chemistry produces a multiplier effect. Bad team chemistry will burn your efforts down to the ground."

"Greatness can exist on its own... But smart people know the absolute best results don't happen when greatness exists in a one-person vacuum."

"There is strength in numbers and a common purpose."

"Strategically place your One More multipliers in the places where they'll be the happiest and most productive. And then leave them alone."

- Equip them with the tools, support, and feedback to perform at their peak.

One More Discomfort

To achieve something meaningful, you must be willing to do what's inconvenient, uncomfortable, or unpopular. This could mean waking up earlier, learning something new, having hard conversations, or pushing through fear, doubt, or fatigue.

- Anything truly worthwhile—whether it's building a business, improving your health, or deepening a relationship—requires effort, inconvenience, and sacrifice.
- Hard-earned victories are more fulfilling. They stretch you, develop your strength, your skills, and your resilience. Ask yourself: What kind of life do I want? What discomfort am I willing to endure to earn it? Then, embrace it as part of personal growth and building a life worth living.

One More Level of Leadership

Everyone is a leader in some capacity—whether you're guiding a team, supporting your family, or leading yourself. Great leaders help others to do more than they believed they could.

- Great leadership is about service, inspiration, and impact. Before you can lead others, you must first lead yourself. That means staying aligned with your values, showing up consistently, and setting the standard through your actions.

Here are several core leadership principles that apply across different roles:

- Cast a big vision. Share a dream that's large enough to include the dreams of those you lead. Let people see how they fit into something bigger, and infect them with your energy and belief. Clearly define what you stand for, and what you stand against.
- Recognize unique gifts. Every person has strengths. Identify them, nurture them, connect them to the team's mission, and bring out the best in the entire team.

KEY QUOTES

"Convenience and greatness cannot co-exist. They are diametrically opposed forces."

"Paying the price of inconvenience is no guarantee you'll succeed. But if you don't inconvenience yourself and confront the difficult things in front of you, you'll have no chance at ending up where you want to be in life."

*"The test of an organization is... its capacity to make common people achieve uncommon performance."
—Peter F. Drucker*

"The best leaders enroll others in their cause. They are evangelists for their dreams."

"As a leader, if you identify these unique gifts in people, you can lead them in a way nobody else can."

KEY QUOTES

- Praise generously—both publicly and privately. Celebrate not just results, but also effort, behaviors and consistency that lead to long-term success.
- Equip people for success. This includes tools, training, and emotional support, which address 6 key human needs:
 - (i) Certainty: The need for stability and predictability.
 - (ii) Variety: The need for stimulation and change.
 - (iii) Love/Connection: The need to feel cared for and part of something bigger than themselves.
 - (iv) Significance: The need to feel important and valued.
 - (v) Growth: The need for learning and personal growth.
 - (vi) Contribution: The need to give beyond oneself and positively impact others.
- Lead by example, with heart. Role-model the standard you expect from others. Believe in and care for people sincerely.
- Develop new leaders to lighten your load, strengthen the team, and create a culture of growth so people can own the dream and carry the torch without you.
- Reinforce key messages and values to embed them in the culture.
- Admit your flaws and mistakes, and stay grounded and authentic.

"There are too few leaders in the world today who sell a big enough dream...that captures the hearts, desires, and emotions of everyone they lead."

"The number one job of a leader is to develop new leaders."

"Leadership is not about saying new things to old people, it's about saying old things to new people."

*"Between stimulus and response, there is a space. In that space is our power to choose our response. In our response lies our growth and our freedom."
—Victor E. Frankl*

One More Inner Anchor

To lead a grounded, fulfilled life, you need equanimity—the ability to stay calm, centered, and balanced—especially when life gets chaotic.

- Equanimity is that quiet strength you lean on when things don't go as planned. It helps you to manage emotions, make wise decisions, and maintain perspective in the face of stress or setbacks. You'll inevitably face disappointments, failure and loss in life. But, you don't have to be defined by them.

Equanimity appears in many faiths and philosophies, from Christianity to Islam, Buddhism and Stoicism. It's also the foundation to all other "One More" principles above. To cultivate equanimity:

- Start with self-awareness. Notice your thoughts and emotional patterns without reacting automatically to them.
- Don't over-identify with pain. See problems in perspective: you are much more than your worst day or a past mistake.
- Accept reality as it is, not as you wish it to be. Let go of the need to control every outcome, release attachments to specific results, and accept that nothing lasts forever.

One More Level of Faith

Faith and prayer are powerful tools for growth, inner peace, and resilience. Faith is what you believe, while prayer is how you act on that belief.

- Ed Mylett's Christian faith has brought him strength, peace and confidence. But this principle applies to anyone—regardless of religion—because it's about the life-changing impact of believing in something deeply. When you focus your thoughts and intentions on something positive—like health, love, or success—you're engaging in a form of prayer.
- Faith isn't just spiritual, but also energetic and scientific. Science shows that everything, including thoughts and emotions, is made of energy. And, energy is always moving, transforming, and influencing what's around it. So when you pray or speak with conviction, you're releasing that energy into the world, shaping your environment and affecting people and outcomes.

Faith helps you to trust what you cannot yet see. Whatever your beliefs, use faith and prayer intentionally to anchor yourself in meaning and gratitude, and take bold action even with uncertainty.

- Make prayer a daily habit to strengthen your sense of purpose and belief. Don't pray for harm, revenge, or anything that goes against love and integrity.

KEY QUOTES

"Equanimity is about finding serenity as you battle the challenges in your life."

*"If you let go a little, you'll have a little peace. If you let go a lot, you'll have a lot of peace. If you let go completely, you'll have complete peace."
—Ajahn Chah*

"Consciously and subconsciously, you pray more than you realize. You may not always view it as prayer, but your mind's natural tendency is to think about what you want in life. You see them as desires, but in reality, desires are a form of prayer."

"There is an energy that attracts certain things to your life and an energy that also repels things away from you as well...having a good understanding of this concept will serve you well in your life."

"Every area of our lives, especially faith, depends on stepping into the unknown to some degree or another."

- In times of doubt or tragedy, draw strength and motivation from your faith, to take action despite uncertainty.

One More Final Chance

Life is finite. We don't know how many chances we'll get, so choose to live each day with urgency and purpose—to connect, live, love, forgive, and contribute—before it's too late.

- Ed Mylett learned this from his father, who struggled with alcoholism for many years. Everything changed when he was given an ultimatum by his wife: change or lose the family. His father chose sobriety and stuck to that decision, one day at a time. One more day of staying clean. One more chance to do the right thing. One more opportunity to serve others. That mindset changed his life—and the lives of many others he mentored.

Make the most of each day and moment like it's your last.

- Ask yourself: How would you show up if this was your final chance to love, speak, lead, appreciate, or forgive? Live with urgency and make it count.
- Start each day afresh. Every morning, tell yourself: "Today I am reborn." Let go of past failure, guilt, or resentment. Choose to focus on what truly matter now.
- Remember: it's never too late to start showing up differently. Whether you're struggling, disconnected, or at rock bottom, just hang on for one more day. Use that time to take one more step, offer one more hug, or extend one more act of grace. Then do it again tomorrow, one more day at a time—because that's all it takes to change your life's trajectory and rewrite your story.

Conclusion and Other Details in the Book

The "One More" philosophy is a powerful one that can transform your identity, habits, relationships, goals, and leadership. All it takes is one more try, one day at a time. This book includes many other

KEY QUOTES

"Wasted time is one of the biggest crimes you can commit against yourself."

"You can't control the end, but you can control the story in between."

"In your darkest and most challenging times, I know many of you think about quitting and giving up. When those thoughts occur to you, just hold on for One More day."
