

THE UNTETHERED SOUL

The Journey Beyond Yourself

Michael Alan Singer

The Big “So What”

In this book, Michael Singer takes us on a journey inward to discover our true selves. It's an essential read for anyone seeking self-awareness, inner peace, and spiritual awakening.

Introduction: Discovering Your True Self

To be true to yourself, you must first define what “self” means.

- Our concept of self is complex and often muddled. Sigmund Freud suggested that the human psyche can be divided into 3 parts: (i) the ID (the primal part of us), (ii) the superego (the logical part conditioned by society), and (iii) the ego (which balances the other 2 parts and selectively presents a part of ourselves to the outside world).
- The book serves as a mirror to help you look inward, sort through the confusion and distractions, and find your true self. Once you've connected with your real self, it's up to you to decide what to do with that knowledge.

In this summary, we'll present the key concepts, insights and practices in 5 parts.

KEY QUOTES

"This above all: to thine own self be true."
—William Shakespeare

"Once refocused, you will realize that you not only have the ability to find yourself, you have the ability to free yourself. Whether you choose to do so or not is entirely up to you."

1. Awaken Your Consciousness

Separate your Self from your Mental Noise

 We talk to ourselves all the time. You are constantly sharing observations, judgments, and even arguing with yourself ("Can you shut up, I'm trying to sleep!")

- Yet, if you listen carefully, you'll notice that most of the words are pointless. Thinking about the weather or traffic doesn't change anything; it only makes you feel better or worse about stuff.
- Don't get tangled up with what the voice is saying, nor try to dissect what's good or bad about it. Just observe that it's there, like noise in the background.

Singer suggests that this voice is your mind's way of protecting you and giving you a sense of control.

- You can't directly control the outside world, so you control your inner narrative by saying things like "It's freezing out here, but I'll be warm once I get home."
- You don't experience the world directly. All external stimuli are filtered through your mind and presented in a way that fits your past experiences and future expectations. In other words, you're living in your mental version of reality.

A key to personal growth is to separate yourself from the mental noise. Get to know the real "you"—which is the person watching and listening to the voice in your head.

- You're not the voice; you're the one listening to it. None of the mental chatter—be it the good or bad stuff—defines you.
- Seek to observe the world without filtering it through your narrative. You'll start to see things as they are, and realize that the problem isn't with life but the fuss we make about it.

KEY QUOTES

"Billions of things are going on in this world. You can think about it all you want, but life is still going to keep on happening."

"Reality is just too real for most of us, so we temper it with the mind."

"There is nothing more important to true growth than realizing that you are not the voice of the mind—you are the one who hears it."

"The real cause of problems is not life itself. It's the commotion the mind makes about life that really causes problems."

Ignore your Neurotic Roommate

To distance yourself from your inner dialogue, imagine the voice as a separate person, like a roommate living in your head.

- Personify this voice and imagine what it's like to have this person living with you—someone who's endlessly judging, criticizing, nitpicking, making demands, and can never be satisfied. Most of what this person says is also wrong or unhelpful.
- Right now, you're trapped in your mind with this neurotic person. To regain control of your mind and life, you must free yourself from your roommate's melodrama.

When something bugs you, don't rush to fix the problem. Instead, ask yourself, "Which part of me is bothered by this?" Often, the solution lies in changing your perspective, not fixing things in the outside world.

- Imagine you're feeling angry with a co-worker who keeps interrupting you during meetings. Instead of assuming she's at fault, ask yourself, "Why does the interruption bother me so much?" You might find that your anger comes from a deeper sense of being undervalued, which could've stemmed from being disregarded in the past.

A "worldly person" tries to solve problems by fixing things in the outside world. A "spiritual person" understands that real peace comes from within. By engaging in yoga—in its traditional role as a spiritual discipline rather than a form of physical exercise—you can free yourself from your inner voice and move toward spiritual awakening.

Discover Who You Truly Are

Yogi and philosopher Ramana Maharshi said that the key to attaining inner freedom is to deliberately and continuously ask yourself, "Who am I?"

- You're not your name, job, or life story. Those are just labels, so who is the person experiencing those things?

KEY QUOTES

"The very fact that you can see the disturbance means that you are not it. The process of seeing something requires a subject-object relationship."

"As it is right now, your life is not your own; it belongs to your inner roommate, the psyche. You have to take it back."

"Maintaining objective awareness of the inner problem is always better than losing yourself in the outer situation."

"Your will is stronger than the habit of listening to that voice. There is nothing you can't do. Your will is supreme over all of this."

"There is nothing higher or deeper than consciousness. Consciousness is pure awareness."

- You're also not your physical traits (e.g. height or weight), since those traits keep changing. So who is the unchanging "you" experiencing all those physical traits?
- Whether you're dreaming or awake, there's a continuity in your consciousness. It's the same "you" who dreams, moves, and reads these words. Who is that "you"?
- You're also not your thoughts or emotions, which change constantly in response to internal/external factors. In the absence of thoughts (e.g. when you're in deep meditation), you're still aware of what's going on. So who is behind those thoughts and emotions?

To find the answer, you must reflect deeply on questions like, "Who sees when I see? Who hears when I hear? Who knows what I know?" As you peel away each layer, what eventually remains is your conscious awareness—the part of you that notices everything.

- Without your awareness, "you" wouldn't exist. Your true self is the unchanging observer who sees every internal thought and emotion, and every external object and event.
- When you look around a room, you take in everything instantly, without conscious thought. That's the part of you that is effortlessly aware. You can't describe everything you perceive in words, just like how you can't describe your existence. You simply exist.

Become Conscious of your Consciousness

In a lucid dream, you're aware that you're dreaming. In daily life, you can also observe yourself experiencing various events, thoughts, or emotions, instead of being totally immersed or lost in them. This is what it means to be "conscious".

Consciousness can focus on anything, from external objects to your own thoughts. For example, you can get so absorbed in a book that you forget everything else. After you close the book, you zoom out and notice the rest of the room again. All the while, you're in your "seat of consciousness", watching the layers of experiences unfold.

"Just as the sun does not leave its position in the sky to illuminate objects with its radiating light, so consciousness does not leave its center to project awareness onto the objects of form, thoughts, and emotions."

- Your inner world is like a personal TV show with familiar thought and emotional patterns. You get so used to this internal drama that you forget you're just there as an observer.
- On a larger scale, life is like a movie that draws you in through various senses (e.g. sights, sounds, smells). You get so immersed in the experiences that you start to identify with them, forgetting your true self.
- To reconnect with your true self, repeatedly say "hello" internally until you're aware of it. This brings you back to the core of inner awareness.

Real meditation isn't just about focusing on an object or thought. It's about contemplating your consciousness itself, so you become aware of your awareness.

- When you focus on consciousness instead of personal experiences, you move from finite to infinite. You're not just a human being experiencing life; you're consciousness observing a human experience. Worldly problems cease to be problems, since they're just phenomena that you observe.
- You're no longer limited to the thoughts/emotions of 1 person, and can perceive the vastness of everything. At this point, when you return to the question of "Who am I?" you'll realize that there's no intellectual answer. Instead, you are the answer.

2. Unblock your Flow of Energy

You Have Infinite Internal Energy

Each of us has a huge, but often untapped, source of internal energy flowing within us.

- Imagine you're a teenager and your girlfriend just broke up with you. You feel so drained that you can barely get out of bed, and no amount of food seems to help. Then, your girlfriend says she wants you back, and suddenly you're back on your feet filled with energy. Where did all that energy come from?

KEY QUOTES

"What differentiates a conscious, centered being from a person who is not so conscious is simply the focus of their awareness."

"[Consciousness is] just there, aware that it's aware."

"There is a source of energy you can draw upon from inside. It is distinct from the outer energy source."

KEY QUOTES

- This energy doesn't come from sleep or calories, but from a deeper internal source, fueling every thought, emotion, and action. You use this energy whenever you resist distractions or suppress your emotions.
- Your internal energy is known by many names, such as Chi, Shakti, or Spirit. It's the surge you feel when your heart is filled with love, or when excitement bubbles up inside you. It has healing properties, explaining why love can be so healing.
- The energy is channeled through your heart and other centers known as "chakras". When your channels are open, energy flows freely and you feel unstoppable. When they're closed, you feel disturbed or lethargic.

This energy is boundless, and it's available to everyone regardless of age or background. It thrives on openness and receptivity. But, we often block the energy by shutting our hearts or minds.

- Our tendency to open or close is programmed from past experiences. For example, a certain color, smell, or image may trigger a negative memory that causes us to close up. We open up when we "like" something, and close up when we "dislike" something.
- Once you're aware of this, you can choose to stay open and receptive to all of life's experiences. When you feel yourself resisting something, deliberately pause, relax, and respond with an open heart and mind. The more you stay open, the stronger the energy flow becomes. Eventually, it overflows and radiates from you to positively impact others around you.

"You have a phenomenal amount of energy inside of you...It gushes up spontaneously from deep inside and restores, replenishes, and recharges you."

"You have a wellspring of beautiful energy inside of you. When you are open you feel it; when you are closed you don't."

Keep Your Heart Open

Your heart is more than just a physical organ; it's a powerful conduit that can resonate with complex emotions and experiences.

- Your heart is a major energy center or a chakra. It can open or close like a valve to regulate the flow of emotional energy, bringing feelings of love, hurt, emptiness, and so on.
- We take in external experiences in the form of energy patterns, such as light and sound waves received through our

"What it means to live life is to experience the moment that is passing through you, and then experience the next moment, and then the next."

eyes and eyes. Energy must remain in motion, and such experiences should ideally flow through us without leaving lasting impressions, like the trees and buildings we notice daily.

Blockages occur when we fixate on certain experiences, causing them to linger and disrupt our emotional state.

- Unresolved energy patterns from past experiences get stored as Samskaras or energy blockages in the heart. When enough impressions build up, the heart and mind get so blocked that everything seems dark, and depression sets in. We also cling to positive memories from the past, repeatedly playing them in our minds.
- Samskaras can resurface later, triggering old emotions and thoughts. Imagine you're walking through a park when you hear a song that was playing during a major argument many years ago. The song is just background noise to other people, but for you it triggers a rush of vivid feelings and images.

To let go of these blockages, you must process and release old energies as they resurface.

- As old feelings or memories come up, don't resist or avoid them. Just stay open, allow the heart to release the stored patterns and cleanse itself. Smile, relax, accept the stored pain (instead of resisting it), and let it go.
- When your heart neither resists nor clings to the past, it can continuously experience love, inspiration, and openness in the moment. This is the heart's natural, optimal condition.

"You have to decide if you want to continue to walk around with stored pain blocking your heart and limiting your life."

Choose Not To Close Up

In modern societies, most people don't lack basic necessities like food and water, nor do we face regular life-threatening dangers. So, we focus our survival instincts on defending our psychological selves.

- In face of uncomfortable situations, we escape by withdrawing internally, closing off our energy centers to protect our ego or self-concept. In so doing, we trap the insecurities and fears within us, blocking personal growth and creating stagnation.

Personal growth and fulfillment comes from accepting and unifying all parts of yourself, including the parts you don't like.

- Observe your responses to people and events. Whenever you feel defensive, you'll notice a sense of tightening within.
- Don't follow the pull of these energies, nor try to fight them. Just relax and release. Turn it into a game, where the goal is to stay unbothered by life's small annoyances.
- Imagine that a colleague dismisses your idea at a meeting, and you feel embarrassed. Instead of dwelling on your feelings or mentally defending your idea, notice the shift in your energy and consciously let it go. Practice this until it becomes your natural state, and you're truly free to experience life.

3. Free Yourself to Live and Grow

Let Go to Rise Up

When you try to avoid or control something out of fear or insecurity, you get pulled into those negative energies. You fall from your seat of consciousness, and no longer see things with calm detachment.

- From the perspective of fear, everything seems darker and more threatening. You're more likely to respond defensively and trigger negative reactions in a downward spiral.

To break the cycle and elevate yourself spiritually, you must recognize and work through the blockages that cause fear.

- Seek to let go of fears and disturbances the moment you notice them. Stay centered in your awareness, observe the disturbances without getting entangled in them, then release them.
- The more you delay the release, the harder it becomes. Once you realize that you've fallen into fear or negativity, just get up, let go, and learn from the experience. Don't blame yourself or try to rationalize things as it will drag you back down.

KEY QUOTES

"Real spiritual growth happens when there is only one of you inside...All parts are unified. Because there is no part of you that you're not willing to see, the mind is no longer divided into the conscious and subconscious."

"If you don't really want it, then don't protect it. The reward for not protecting your psyche is liberation."

"Life is actually trying to help you. Life is surrounding you with people and situations that stimulate growth."

"Getting involved in the darkness does not dispel darkness; it feeds it."

"That which is holding you down can become a powerful force that raises you up. You just have to be willing to take the ascent."

Remove the Internal Thorns

Imagine a thorn in your arm that causes a sharp pain when it's touched. You have 2 choices:

- You can avoid anything that might touch the thorn, such as staying away from crowded places or wearing a protective device on your arm. In your effort to avoid the pain, you end up building your life around the problem.
- Or, you can simply remove the thorn so it no longer bothers you.

Our internal thorns (painful thoughts and emotions) are merely old, blocked energies. Instead of avoiding or suppressing them (thus pushing the thorns deeper), acknowledge and release them.

- You're not your pain or stress; you're Awareness observing it. Once you can notice yourself observing those painful feelings, you'll be free from them. You'll realize that feelings are just another "thing" in the universe, like cars or trees.
- The more time you spend in self-awareness, the more you start to experience a new positive energy—Shakti or Spirit—flowing from within. This is the essence of becoming a free and transcendent being.

Choose to Stop Suffering

To free yourself from suffering, you must first choose not to suffer. The harder you try to avoid/control fears, insecurities, or inner pain, the more they weigh you down.

- The root cause of our suffering lies in our sense of inadequacy, which manifests as insecurity, anxiety, and self-consciousness. We want everything to fit our expectations, for everyone to like us, and to never get hurt. Our mind races non-stop to find ways to fulfill these wishes, but it's impossible.

"In the deepest sense, you free yourself by finding yourself."

"Awareness does not fight; awareness releases...That's how you become a free being—you transcend."

"The prerequisite to true freedom is to decide that you do not want to suffer anymore."

Things become ok the moment you center yourself, stop fighting reality, and decide to be ok with everything. It's that simple.

- To stop being controlled by your psyche (the neurotic roommate in your mind), stop listening to it. Simply observe your thoughts quietly without getting involved. Realize that the mind's melodramas serve no purpose at all, choose to distance yourself from the mental noise, and let go of whatever's disturbing you.
- Designate moments in your regular day (e.g. as you enter and exit your car) to pause, center yourself, and become aware of your internal/external state. With practice, you'll find it easier maintain a state of centered consciousness.

Accept Momentary Pain to Attain Freedom

Change is uncomfortable as it pushes us beyond our comfort zones and our habitual need for safety and control. Yet, there can be no growth without change.

- If you look deeply, you'll find a core of pain in your heart. We create layers of "protection", such as external appearances or social acceptance, to distance ourselves from the pain. But, the more you try to hide from the pain, the more easily you're unsettled by the smallest triggers.
- Our efforts to avoid pain often end up creating even more pain. For example, if you approach someone with a fear of rejection, you're likely to over-react to every perceived slight, increasing the chance of rejection. Avoiding pain also limits our ability to explore and grow beyond our current self.

True growth comes from facing and dealing with inner pain, so you free yourself from the shackles of fear and anxiety. See any inner pain or disturbance as a temporary shift in energy. As you relax and allow it to pass through you, you might feel an intense, burning sensation. Embrace it as part of the transformative process.

KEY QUOTES

"That's how you get out. You just let it go."

"Just watch the mind talk, and keep relaxing and releasing. Fall behind the noise."

"Life is continuously changing, and if you're trying to control it, you'll never be able to fully live it."

"Real growth takes place when you finally decide to deal with the pain. Because the pain is at the core of the heart, it radiates out and affects everything you do."

4. Go Far Beyond Yourself

Dismantle the Self-Made Walls

As you grow spiritually and take a deeper seat within yourself, it becomes easier to observe your stream of thoughts, emotions, and sensory experiences. You realize that you're separate from the mental-emotional turmoil you used to identify with, and are now ready to break your psyche's grip on your consciousness.

- Imagine your psyche as a house that you built and furnished with your past experiences, beliefs, opinions, fears, hopes, and dreams. Over time, you become so comfortable in this house that you can't imagine stepping outside.
- You defend this house (your psyche) vigorously, patching up its walls against any perceived threat. To enjoy freedom and the fullness of life outside, you must let go of the walls you've constructed and expose yourself to the broader reality.

Enlightenment isn't a distant, mythical state. It's attained by breaking down the mental-emotional walls instead of reinforcing them in your daily life.

- Choose to stop maintaining or defending the psychological fortress that's keeping you in the dark.
- Picture your mind as a house amidst an ocean of light. Let the walls of limiting thoughts and experiences crumble away, so your consciousness can expand and merge with the vast reality that has always been there. This is how you reach enlightenment.

Keep Moving Beyond Existing Limits

Our perceived limits come from our mental boundaries.

- Our logical mind finds it hard to grapple with the vastness of the infinite universe, so it creates a sense of control by

KEY QUOTES

"True freedom is very close; it's just on the other side of your walls."

"The soul is infinite. It is free to expand everywhere. It is free to experience all of life. This can only happen when you are willing to face reality without mental boundaries."

breaking the world into manageable pieces, including our views and beliefs.

- To transcend existing limits, you must let go of existing mental constructs. Accept reality as it is, not as you wish or expect it to be.

When you're spiritually awakened, you realize that you've been caged by your fears and comfort zone.

- Each time you approach your limits, you feel uncomfortable. It's like bumping against the bars of a cage charged with electricity, so you pull back and retreat to "safety."
- Your psychological boundaries can't truly hurt you, and it's possible to push beyond the bars. Just relax, resist the urge to pull back, and move past the discomfort.
- Spiritual growth comes from a lifelong commitment to keep facing your discomfort and pushing past those limits.

KEY QUOTES

"A cage by any other name is still a cage. You must be willing to go beyond."

"Your self-concept is just a collection of thoughts about yourself."

"You just decide, once and for all, to take the journey by constantly letting go."

"You are consciousness, and you can free yourself from all of this by relaxing behind it."

Let Go of your Self-Concept and Mental Models

In face of fear and uncertainty, we often cling to our thoughts and feelings as if they're life rafts, giving us something firm to hold on to. These get anchored in our psyche, gradually forming an "island" of self-identity in the ocean of our consciousness.

- Our self-concept is basically a complex structure of beliefs and thoughts that we cling to, e.g. our gender identity, opinions, and experiences.

We suffer when we try to maintain perfect order and control in a world that's complex and dynamic. Keep challenging and letting go of your self-concept or internal model.

- When your internal model clashes with reality, don't justify or defend your views. Use such disturbances to challenge your existing mental model and bring yourself closer to reality.
- Each time you feel disturbed, stop and focus on the part of you that notices the disturbance. This brings you back to Awareness and the knowledge that you're separate from what you observe. Eventually, this becomes habitual and you can just allow the process to happen without taking deliberate action.

5. Choose to Live Life Fully

Choose to Live with Unconditional Happiness

The most critical choice you can make in life isn't about your career or relationships, but whether you choose to be happy.

- Often, we add conditions to our happiness ("I'll be happy if..."), only to limit our happiness. Choose to be unconditionally happy, i.e. have fun no matter what life throws at you.
- You have a finite amount of time on this Earth. Your suffering helps no one, so why not enjoy yourself while you can?
- It's easy to be happy when things go well. The true test comes when you face losses or difficulties. The key is to keep your heart open and experience everything fully.
 - (i) Instead of complaining or feeling down, find joy and wonder in the experience.
 - (ii) If you realize that you've shut down, just pick yourself up and re-commit to staying open. Keep letting go of the parts of you that find reasons to be unhappy.
- When you embrace unconditional happiness, you start to experience higher states of ecstasy, bliss, and even a connection with the divine.

Choose To Embrace Life, Not Resist It

Most of our struggles are with past events or future anxieties, which stem from our fixed ideas of how things should be.

- If something has already happened, it's pointless to resist it. You're just wasting energy fighting with yourself and causing more internal turmoil.

KEY QUOTES

"You really only have one choice in this life... Do you want to be happy, or do you not want to be happy? It's really that simple. Once you make that choice, your path through life becomes totally clear."

"You were not put on Earth to suffer. You're not helping anybody by being miserable."

"Events don't determine whether or not you're going to be happy. They're just events. You determine whether or not you're going to be happy."

"Since the event has already passed, you are actually struggling with yourself, not with the event."

- We also waste energy worrying about future events that may never happen. Such resistance creates tension to close up the heart, blocking energy flow and reducing your vibrancy.

If you can embrace life events as they are, you'll live without stress, problems, or fear.

- Let go of preconceived notions and allow life to unfold in the present moment. Imagine being stuck in traffic. Instead of succumbing to stress and frustration, choose to accept the situation. You can relax, listen to music, or simply observe the world around you.
- Redirect your energy from resisting life to experiencing it. See your time on Earth as a gift, filled with exciting and challenging events to help you grow. Choose acceptance and openness over resistance and control.

Embrace the Inevitability of Death

Death is the ultimate teacher of life. It shows the insignificance of our worldly attachments, and the truth that we are not our bodies.

- Ask yourself: If you only had 1 week left to live, how would you spend your final days?
 - (i) For example, if you're jealous that your wife is out meeting her friends, consider what happens when you're no longer around—do you want her to be supported by friends then?
 - (ii) Realize that everything is impermanent, and your worldly concerns won't matter when you're dead.

Once you accept the inevitability of death, you can overcome the fear of living.

- Recognize that each breath could be your last, and make each moment count—even the mundane ones like walking in the rain. Once you're truly fulfilled, you can embrace death with no regret.

KEY QUOTES

"It is not life's events that are causing problems or stress. It is your resistance to life's events that is causing this experience."

"Life is giving you a gift, and that gift is the flow of events that takes place between your birth and your death."

"Death is not a morbid thought. Death is the greatest teacher in all of life."

"Life is not something you get; it's something you experience."

"This is how to live your life. You live it as though you were on the verge of death, because you are."

Find the Natural Equilibrium in Everything

 In the Tao Te Ching, Lao-Tzu describes the Tao (or “the Way”). It’s about finding natural balance in life’s dualities.

- Life is full of opposing forces, like yin and yang, light and dark. Excess in any form—be it eating too much or too little, being too close or too distant in a relationship—leads to imbalance.
- The laws of physics say that when a pendulum is released from 1 end, it will swing to the other end. When you keep moving between extremes, you waste much more energy than if you take a middle, direct path.

The Tao teaches us to find the point of equilibrium in anything—including yourself—where there is no push in either direction. This natural center is where you find harmony, clarity, and vitality.

- This point of equilibrium is not static, but dynamic. Like sailing, it requires constant adjustment and adaptation to maintain balance amidst changing conditions. Constantly assess if you are living in balance or getting lost in the extremes. Find your sweet spot in every aspect of life, from work to personal relationships.
- Centered living means flowing harmoniously with the rhythms of the universe, and not taking life personally. Your actions become effortless as you move as one with the forces of life instead of striving against the currents.

Embrace the Divine In You

Singer argues that you cannot understand God from religious texts, which are written by humans and thus colored by cultural influences. The best way to know God is through your own spiritual ascent.

- As you release lower vibrations like anger and fear, you experience an “upward drift” in your spirit. There’s a sense of elevation, spaciousness, and distance from reactive emotions.
- This is not about grasping for the spiritual, but releasing the non-spiritual. The more you let go of physical, emotional, and

KEY QUOTES

“Everything has its yin and yang. The Way is the place in which these forces balance quietly.”

“The extremes create their opposites; the wise avoid them. Find the balance in the center and you will live in harmony.”

“Effortless action is what happens when you come into the Tao...The forces take care of themselves as you sit in the center.”

“The drop of consciousness, which is individual Spirit, is like a ray of light emanating from the sun. The individual ray is really no different from the sun.”

mental attachments, the more you identify with your spiritual essence rather than your physical form. You experience less judgment and negativity, feel a deeper love for all things/people, and start to radiate unconditional love and openness.

Eventually, you reach a point where individual consciousness merges with universal consciousness.

- This is described in various religious texts, where individuality dissolves into a collective, divine essence. In this state, you see beauty and perfection in all, perceiving everything/everyone with pure love. Singer believes this is a mirror of how God might view His creation.
- Divine love is unconditional and compassionate; it shines on everyone, just like how the sun shines on one and all, regardless of our actions. Let go of any fear, guilt, or shame in your relationship with God, as this only closes off your heart and Spirit. Instead, trust in God's constant, unwavering love.

Other Details in the Book to Look out For

In the book, Singer explores the nuances and practical applications for each of the concepts above, taking us on an exploration of our inner world and a journey of personal growth and spiritual awakening. For more details, please visit <https://untetheredsoul.com>.

About the Author

Michael Alan Singer (born 1947) is an American author, journalist, motivational speaker, and former software developer. He is best known for his writings on spirituality, meditation, and New Age philosophy. Singer earned his masters degree in economics at the University of Florida. While working on a doctorate program, he reportedly had a spiritual awakening and went into seclusion. This eventually led to his first book, The Search for Truth.

KEY QUOTES

"You can't offend the Divine One; its very nature is light, love, compassion, protection, and giving."

"Let go of the idea of a judgmental God. You have a loving God. In truth, you have love itself for a God."
